CORPORATE WELLNESS

“When an employee decides to terminate their working relationship, they take their company’s trade secrets. Employee turnover is disruptive and expensive. It costs a tremendous amount of money to recruit and train new employees. Recruiting, hiring and training are a huge investment of time and energy for key managers and executives.

Corporations are becoming more concerned about building and maintaining the culture that will attract, optimize and to retain the talent they want and need.

Successful companies realize that in order to get on with the work of doing business, they must invest in the wellness of their employees. Motivated, balanced employees lead to increased retention and productivity.”
